During the decades after World War II, two powerfully disturbing novels captured the imagination of those of us who were apprehensive about the human future: George Orwell's "Nineteen Eighty-four" and Aldous Huxley's "Brave New World.". The former, generalizing from Soviet despotism, depicted human life flattened under the boot of a worldwide tyranny rendered invincible by means of the insights of mass psychology and consummate techniques of surveillance and intimidation.

Dystopian novels such as Brave New World are critiques of modern institutions. Such works take an instance of injustice or perceived ill in a society and take those situations to what would be their logical ends. In Brave New World, Huxley critiques modern governmental institutions whose power has slowly crept into the lives of ordinary people. This process often occurs in the name of security or peace, yet such actions inevitably lead to the destruction of everything that is good in a ...

Brave New Worlds is a large comic book shop with a good amount of space. Shop is well stocked and covers just about every interest. They have a good new pull selection and large selection of graphic novels. Longbox selection is fair, but they have a large and well organized selection of dollar books. Wall book selection was also fair.
